

Some things the cold keeps.

For nineteen years, Aino Hietala stayed away. When her father dies alone in the snowbound town of Kivijärvi, she comes north to bury him and empty the house — a week, in and out.

But the lake behind the house is wrong. Footprints end at the foundation each night. A knocking comes up through the floor, three at a time, keeping perfect time. And out over the ice stands the sauna her father tended alone every week of his life — and the ledgers, going back to 1919, that record what four men did to the woman who would not leave her land, and what they built to keep her down.

The watch her family kept for a hundred years is broken. The thaw is coming early. And whatever waits beneath the ice is done waiting.
